Q.4

Read the following passage and answer the questions given below:

(15)

Information is what we need to know so that we can answer questions and solve problems. Doctors need information about diseases; businessmen need to know about costs, farmers need to know about the weather. There is now so much information that we talk about 'information explosion.' There are newspapers, encyclopaedias, maps, films videos and about 10,000 million books in the world, all containing information! In order for this information to be of any use, it must be stored and organized (sorted out) in different ways.

Information technology (or IT) is about different ways that information can be handled by electronics. The 'technology' part helps people to do things to the 'information' part. People collect and supply the information. Electronic technology is used to organize the information in different ways. Then people can use the results to answer questions or solve problems.

IT enables us to store vast amount of information in a small space. The contents of a 50 volume encyclopaedia can be stored electronically in a space smaller than a matchbox. The information technology worlds is growing very rapidly.

Questions:

- i) What is information? Farmers need to know about what?
- ii) What is information technology?
- iii) What does the term 'information explosion' mean? How can it be useful?
- iv) How does IT help us.
- v) What technology is used to organize the information in different ways?

- Q.4 Read the passage carefully and give the following questions given below. (15)

The safety of ships at sea does not depend only on the arrangements made in the ships themselves. Dangerous coasts and rocks may be seen in the day time, but they are a threat to safe navigation at night. Light houses are therefore erected at such places to warn sailors of the danger. Modern light houses are put up at all dangerous places near the courses followed by ships. On some rocky coast several light houses may be built not far from each other, and in order that sailors on a ship may know which is which, they have different arrangements of light. One light house will give a single flash at regular intervals: another may give two flashes: a third may give two followed by one: and so on. By watching these lights the navigator is able to decide exactly where he is and he can set his course with confidence. In the approaches to some ports two continuous lights are set up, one above the other but some distance behind: when they appear from the sea one above the other, the ship is on right course: but if they do not, the captain knows that he is off his safe course and likely to strike a rock or the bottom of the sea. In the planning and construction of a light house, everything possible must be done to prevent its being blown down in a high wind or destroyed by high seas.

Questions

- i) Why are light houses erected?
- ii) What are threats to safe navigation at night?
- iii) When is the ship on the right course?
- iv) Where are modern light houses put?
- v) Give a suitable title to this passage.
